Project for Fuck Capitalism game jam (may 1-30) that I advertise on the forum and try to get 1/2 teammates (forum)
=====

“Impossible to Fix” (a game about the violence of inaction) is an anti-idle game about the status-quo bias where you try to save humanity from its certain extinction at the hand of capitalism.

Through classic idle-game mechanics, you unlock more and more progressive fixes to build up your “Reform” score. This score is competing with the snowballing effect of the climate crisis which has an increasing “Crisis” score. You need to get Reform higher than Crisis to stop people from dying before humanity’s extinction.
A run is expected to last around 5 minutes.

Here’s the twist: it’s impossible to do that. There’s no fixing capitalism. The only way to win the game is before you even start: in the welcome menu, you can choose the difficulty (easier times, normal, new normal, post new normal or impossible). Only if you pick “impossible” will the game offer you to completely dismantle the political system and start anew with a non capitalist economy, which is going to be tough but is the only path to victory.

Final version of the game

When Crisis is higher than Reform, people keep dying. Ideally, I’d like this chance to tackle the “Compassion fade” bias.

Instead of a simple counter, I’d like each death to be a popup with a little bio of who died, so that when deaths get numerous instead of being “just a statistic” it becomes a sea of popups that the player has to deliberately group together in order to feel the weight of the number. The user has to manually set the number of deaths to group together, and the possible number increases over time.

Game I pitch to BRIEFS (before mid-August)

In order to better value my effort, I’ll keep this “narrative death popup” mechanism as an extra feature for after the game jam, and I’ll pitch it as a standalone game to Briefs where you have to dismiss the popups to keep playing a simple game of snake. I’ll frame this as an agility game where you have to dismiss popups with clicks and control snake with keyboard, and I’ll be called something like “Divided Attention”.
